Regions are regarded as the new powerhouses for innovation and adoption of personalised medicine. They will drive the transition towards sustainable healthcare and personalised health.

The Assembly of European Regions (AER) defines region as a territorial authority existing at the level immediately below that of the central government, with its own political representation in the form of an elected regional assembly.

Often these regions better reflect culture, identity and a sense of common interests. Regions are, therefore, well placed to bring personalised medicine and healthcare closer to the citizen.
